West Asian Security Realignment

GS II

- West Asian security is shaped by rivalries, alliances and competing national interests. The Abraham Accords established diplomatic relations between Israel and certain Arab countries, but unresolved regional disputes and changing security threats continue to influence how these governments cooperate.

- Growing tensions involving Iran have encouraged some Gulf countries to reconsider their security arrangements. The United Arab Emirates has traditionally relied on American military support, but changing regional threats can increase interest in additional defence partnerships and alternative security guarantees.

- Israel's regional military actions and continuing conflicts have complicated diplomatic cooperation with Arab countries. Governments must consider both strategic benefits and public opposition when strengthening ties with Israel, particularly while Palestinian concerns and wider regional instability remain unresolved.

- Regional security arrangements become difficult when participating countries have different threat perceptions and political priorities. Sustainable cooperation therefore requires diplomatic engagement, credible security commitments and efforts to address underlying conflicts rather than relying entirely on military partnerships.

West Asia's changing alliances reflect competing security interests, but durable regional stability requires diplomacy, credible cooperation and progress on unresolved political conflicts.
